Stop administering a process & start managing third-party risk

As firms increase reliance on third parties, they open themselves up to risk across domains such as cyber security, sanctions, financial stability, reputational risk, ESG, and more. Poor third-party risk management (TPRM) can lead to significant business disruption, regulatory fines, reputational damage, and loss of business.

Top drivers for investment in TPRM

- Response to third-party incidents
- Increasing regulatory requirements, potential for fines
- Responsible and ethical business practices
- Cost reduction and operating efficiency

Extended enterprise risk management (EERM) third-party risk management (TPRM) global survey 2020, Deloitte & Touche LLP

Typically, firms don’t have the resources, time, or budgets to focus on this complex, resource-intensive process. TPRM is often fragmented and inefficient with supplier access delayed by bureaucracy.
